

Bear Creek Lake State Park

Nestled in the heart of the Cumberland State Forest in central Virginia, Bear Creek Lake is 329 acres of hardwood and pine forests, riparian areas, vernal pools, creeks and old fields. Such a wide range of habitat support a diverse array of bird species.

Different seasons bring different birds to the park. Some birds are referred to as “residents” meaning they can be seen throughout the year. Others can be seen as they migrate from the north to the south for warmer climates. In the spring, southern species migrate north to take advantage of the food resources as insects emerge from winter dormancy. Depending on the season and species of birds, some may nest and raise their young in the park while others are just passing through.

This checklist was developed from inventories and observations conducted in the park. Through conservation and management efforts to protect habitats, birds will have a place to call home at Bear Creek Lake State Park. As park managers continue to adapt programs to benefit the coexistence of people and birds, we can expect to see a diversity of birds flying over for visitors and future visitors to see and enjoy.

Bird Watching

Whether you are a veteran bird watcher or just an observer during a walk through the park, you can see many birds in action building nests and searching for food. Look for birds flying overhead or within the forests and fields. Don't just use your eyes, listen out for the unique calls and songs. Happy birding.

Even if you visit the park during a slower birding period, don't forget that exciting and rare birds can turn up any time.

It is also important to keep in mind, if you are out hiking and come upon a bird's nest, you shouldn't collect, touch, or disturb the birds or their nests. It is also prohibited to collect feathers.

Please take picture and leave it for others to enjoy.
